Attracting wellness is all related to your thoughts and/or your vibrations, your environment and your programming. What is meant by this?

Your thoughts are a reflection of your daily environment.

The individuals you come into contact with, the conditions you find yourself in, the TV, the radio, the papers, the books you read, your loved ones, acquaintances and colleagues.

All of these things impact your mindset and they likewise impact your emotions.

And it has been said that when these emotions happen to be negative or bottled up, they might cause energy blockages in your body that might possibly manifest themselves physically in your body as ailments or sicknesses.

For instance:

- 1) Fear might cause issues in your kidneys.
- 2) Anger might cause issues in your liver.
- 3) Concern might cause issues in your spleen.
- 4) Sorrow might cause issues in your lungs.

After years of being pelted with stories and personal experiences of fear, death, illness and natural disasters, your brain naturally becomes programmed with a particular damaging thought pattern.

Then tension and worry gets to be a part of your life.

This is why you require a positive or at least a more neutral way of responding to the tension in your life.

Being in a nerve-racking and worrisome atmosphere and hearing the stories on the news about murder, famine, floods or the economy will only bog your brain down to the point that this is all you think about.

Then tension eats at your brain and body, and might cause you to get sick.

It likewise kills! So what may you do? A few may utilize the law of attraction, meditation, prayer and words to produce and draw in a calming and stress-free environment for themselves, but without a doubt a few will have to seek medical help...

Begin by trying your best to get rid of the negative stressors that might be causing you issues. I know this in itself may induce stress.

However utilize the Law of Attraction to its fullest. It might help you produce the surroundings you want and need. Center on it and put it into action. Take that initiative!

Attracting wellness and having the tools to acquire a healthy brain and body is something available to us all. It's part of abundantly living. After all, what good is it to draw in love, being happy and wealth... if we're not here to savor it.

our outer reality is determined by our inner experience. There's no “objective” world out there that's making us think and feel particular things. What's truly happening is that our own thinking, feeling and behaviors are producing our experience of the objective world.

Our consciousness, which regards mind, spirit (or heart) and body, expresses itself through ideas, feeling and action. The blended energy of our thoughts, feelings and behaviors is sending forth a vibration that's drawing in individuals and experiences to us. This is the fundamental idea of the law of attraction.

It's an curious idea when you're initially exposed to it, however if you open your mind and truly look at the world around you, you'll see abundant evidence that this is real. Why are a few individuals accident prone, when other people seldom have accidents? How is it that a few individuals form excellent relationships, while other people can't get a date at all? Why do a few individuals battle with money, while other individuals may make millions, go belly-up, and then create millions again?

We all cook up reasons in our mind to explain why this happens. We tell ourselves things like, "They're simply smarter (or creative, magnetic, blessed or lucky) than I am," while every time we repeat the same pattern of accidents, failure, financial letdown, heartbreak or whatever other damaging pattern we're stuck in we say, "See, this constantly happens to me!"

Well, the law of the harvest states that all the reasons we provide ourselves to explain how come something outside of ourselves is inducing our unhappiness and deficiency of success aren't true! We're drawing in both our successes and our failures by what is within ourselves. Most individuals convey this idea as, "You produce your own reality." I think it's more correctly said as, "You produce your own illusions (or delusions, if you choose)!"

When I first began to comprehend this, I actually didn't like the idea. You mean that I'm responsible for all this crap in my life!? You see, if I'm responsible for this crap that keeps happening to me again and again, then I can't fault it on my parents, my ex-partners, my conditions, Satan or even God. That means I can't wallow around in self-pity.

Playing the victim is an excellent role as it absolves you of responsibility for your life story, but it's likewise a crappy role as it means you can't modify anything about your life story. You're "locked into" attempting to change everybody and everything around you so you may "be happy." Regrettably, The Higher Power only gave you the power to shift one person's life story and that's your own, so when you put the responsibility for your life story, happiness and success on other people, your life is totally out of control.

If you may overcome the "pity me" syndrome, the great part of learning about the law of harvest is that you have the might to shift your life story from the inside out. While we can't quit being a magnet that draws in individuals and conditions into our life (any more than we may elude the law of gravity), we may shift the polarity of what's inside of us from negative to positive and draw in more positive experiences and fewer damaging ones.

Once you comprehend the principles the law of attraction and how our consciousness produces our reality, you start to comprehend why people are sick. First, what do most individuals center on? Disease, naturally. They think about their diseases, they fret about their diseases and they spend time battling their diseases.

I know, because after some wonderful lecture about how to make the body fit, there will always be individuals lined up to ask how they may “cure” this or that. The idea of treating disease is so securely entrenched in their brains, that they haven’t truly heard what was just said.

Chapter 5:

Conclusion

The dread most individuals have about disease (and passing away) drives them to make decisions based on that dread. Among the principles of the law of attraction is that if we act out of dread we draw in more of what we dread. In Native American healing traditions the medicine man, or shaman, is supposed to defeat his fear of disease and death and only then may he fearlessly approach the ill and dying and help them.

If the law of attraction is true, and we draw in more of what we dread, resist and attack, it's no wonder that modern medicine is so full of side effects! The total system is rooted in dread and founded on a "war" model-attacking disease, battling infection, obliterating cancer etc..

Regrettably, when most individuals first get involved in natural healing, they bring this mentality with them. I find it intriguing to see how much of what individuals do, even in natural wellness care, is motivated by dread. For example, I see individuals who are frightened of environmental toxins and are forever concerned about their exposure to them.

I likewise see individuals who are frightened of assorted foods, saying things like, "meat is bad" and "milk is bad." This dread and fight mindset in addition to carries over into their ceaseless blasts on modern medicine, the FDA and all the other people out to smash our health. Regrettably, this places them into the same attraction pattern that their “foes” have and produces more conflict, disharmony and finally ill health.

Battling disease will never produce wellness. As well, attacking physicians and the FDA won't better the wellness of the world. If you see The Secret you'll learn that declaring war on something produces more of it. If you wish to produce something positive, you have to center your energy on what you wish, not what you don't wish.

The only difference between positive and damaging thinking is this-damaging thinking is centering your attention on what you don't wish and positive thinking is centering your attention on what you do wish. Either way, the law of attraction states you'll get more of what you center on in your life.

So, how do we shift this pattern? We have a reset button. The reset button is a question we ask ourselves if we discover ourselves centering on what we don't wish. The question is, “So, what do I wish?” This means, that we may quit asking questions like:

- How do I heal my disease?
- How do I cut down my tension?
- How to I alleviate my pain?
- How do I do away with my cancer?

Rather, we ought to be asking questions like:

- How do I help my body mend?
- How may I feel more at ease? How may I feel great?
- How may I support my immune system?
- How may I get to be fitter?

By shifting the focus from what we don't wish, to what we do wish, we switch from a disease-care mentality to a wellness-care mentality and this is what we truly need.

The amazing thing about centering on wellness care rather than disease care is that we may help individuals with simple things. It makes the task of helping individuals get moving much easier, as there are particular basic things that may help the body defeat a lot of the chronic wellness issues prevalent in our society.
